

Most of what appears in this book was never intended to be seen by anyone: some of it was for specific projects, some of it just for me. Over the years, friends and collaborators suggested that maybe I should do a book. And I did absolutely nothing about it. It wasn't until Derek Frey, Leah Gallo and Holly Kempf became involved that this book became a reality (the former is my long time assistant, the latter two were creators of a Sweeney Todd film book). They sorted through forty years of "stuff": notebooks, scraps of paper, napkins, etc. to shape what lies between these covers. For whatever it's worth, I hope you like it.

BOY FROM THE BURBANK LAGOON

Tim Burton never felt he belonged in the Southern California suburbia where he was raised. He identified more with Universal Film Monsters than with the people around him. He channeled his discontent into art. The same boy who delighted in drawings, Super-8 films, and homemade costumes grew up to become the auteur of a series of successful films that have gained him world renown. The films are famous but their origins are much less recognized — his drawings. They drive the look, feel, and tone of his characters and sets. But his need to draw reaches far beyond his films. It permeates his life. He draws anywhere, anytime, with anything. Though Burton's films are distinctively his, they are collaborative productions, filtered through the hands and minds of others. This book offers artwork that is undiluted, straight from Burton to the viewer.

To believe that each sketch is intended as a message would be missing the point of what the artwork is to him: a focus, an escape, a release, a train of thought. Yet, assembled, it undeniably forms a patchwork puzzle of the artist and his perspective. His art can be read as an insightful acknowledgement of the duality of life: moving and mischievous, beautiful and tragic, funny and heartbreaking. He understands and can express the feelings of being an outcast. His work illuminates dark places, revealing common ground in our absurdities. His underlying message is to question the idea of normalcy while celebrating individuality. He can take something that in description should be horrifying, yet through his fingertips becomes sweet and sympathetic.

His style defies simple description, but people try. It has been called "gothic," a catchall word that describes a fantasy land inhabited by swirls, stripes, and stitches; tilted structures, asymmetry, and crooked staircases. It's populated by woeful-eyed, wild-haired, spindly people who cohabitate with skeletons and monsters. All of this is sprinkled with a liberal amount of black and red. Burton persistently avoids categorizing himself, saying he doesn't want to become a label or a brand. People have done it for him, coining the word "Burtonesque" to characterize those who mimic his dark, fantastical style.

Describing Burton's art doesn't seem possible without at least a cursory examination of his appearance, which expresses his aesthetics as much as his own drawings. His famous curly hair frizzes on its own accord, the perfect analogy for his thought process, pointed in every direction and unapologetically wild. His hands fly around as he speaks, aiding in the state of his hair, by constantly running through it. Some part of him is always in motion. Patience is not one of his virtues; speed is essential to his nature. His clothes, usually but not always black, are prone towards baggy comfort and easy matching. Despite popular belief, he wears the occasional blue and red and, once in awhile, even light blue. He is fond of shirts and pants with skeletons, and takes delight in toy eyeballs or other objects that keep his hands occupied and his nerves soothed. Oversized, black-rimmed sunglasses hide his eyes from both people and blinding camera flashes. In public he is smiling but nervous: if standing, then inevitably pacing; if sitting, then in the deepest corner, on edge and watchful. Though shy amongst strangers, around friends he is laid-back, talkative, and very funny.

This personality shines through during interviews. He is witty, sharp, and humorous, if slightly choppy, as though his brain is working on a level that his mouth cannot faithfully reproduce. But he is most in his element when he is sketching. Visual expression is his easiest form of communication. For him, it captures feeling in a way that talking cannot—and more quickly. In drawings, the idea of feeling neurotic and coming apart at the seams literally can be translated into a patchwork figure stitched together. In art, there is simplicity, clarity, economy and speed.

Many people perusing this book already will be well-versed in Tim Burton lore, and for those interested in more detail, there are plenty of books out there (Burton on Burton being straight from the man himself), but for those who are new to Tim Burton, included is a brief history.

A BRIEF HISTORY

Timothy Walter Burton was born on August 25, 1958. Since he was little, he drew, and drew well. He was raised in Burbank, a part of Los Angeles County where rows of identical houses repeated themselves. He loved his family, but he didn't relate to them. Burton grew up in the 1950s, where a narrow idea of normalcy was perpetuated by a puritanical vision of the American dream.¹ His father, Bill, a former minor league baseball player, worked for the Burbank Department of Parks and Recreation and drew secretly on the side. His mother, Rickie, owned a niche shop that sold cat-themed knick-knacks. She had a crafty streak; Burton remembers her making pinecone Santas and snowmen for Christmas. His brother, Daniel, was also artistically talented, though Burton says they each "did their own thing."

Estranged from his neighborhood and family, Burton found respite by playing in the local cemetery. But the gravestones offered temporary solace. The pressure to conform turned Burton inward, and in response he unleashed his artwork outward. He had an ally in his high school art teacher, Doris Adams, who encouraged her students to follow their own paths. Burton knew he couldn't draw like everyone else, and he felt inadequate. It was a revelation and turning point when Burton realized that he didn't have to draw like everyone else. Art became both his catharsis and a way to escape into a fantasy world. Peers in school labeled him "weird" for his creative tendencies, and he learned at an early age about society's tendency to catalogue and judge.² He developed an allergy to both categorization and authority.

Being characterized as an outsider gave Burton the unexpected freedom to express himself. He embraced being different and this choice fomented his artistic talents. No longer desiring to fit in, he began observing the people and society around him, almost like one of his beloved inventors with a science project. His experiments were his stories. From the beginning, Burton was a visual storyteller. He wrote and illustrated amusing poems and children's books, directed and starred in Super-8 movies, and staged elaborate pranks in his neighborhood, such as tossing clothes into a neighbor's pool which had just been cleaned with strong chemicals, and convincing him that a person had fallen in and dissolved.³

Burton always forged his own path, using artwork as a way to avoid writing assignments, submitting self-made Super-8 films and drawn reports instead. Rather than buy greeting cards, Burton designed his own. Always nontraditional, they ranged from two trees decorating a "Christmas man" to a get-well card where an alien is dressed like a doctor. Ironically, the suburban town that drove him to create was accepting of his artwork. In the ninth grade, he won a local competition to design an anti-litter poster, which graced the sides of City of Burbank garbage trucks. In high school, he placed third in a Burbank Fire Department fire prevention poster contest. Around the same time, he and a group of peers won third place in a World of Wheels van painting competition (his team received their award from a woman costumed as Zira from the 1968 Planet of the Apes). His artwork populated the posters of the Burbank Youth Band in which Burton participated, as well as school drama productions. His drawing of an angry football player squashing the opposing team ran on the front of The Burbank City Employee newsletter in 1977, after Burton turned 19.

Though Burton had friends, they were transient. The constants in his childhood were horror and science-fiction films and similarly themed television shows. He felt a kinship with those poor, beleaguered creatures like Frankenstein and the Creature from the Black Lagoon. Films expanded the boundaries of Burton's world closer to the size of the one he so desired. He revered the legendary Vincent Price and identified with such maestros of classic horror as Lon Chaney Sr. and Jr., Boris Karloff, Peter Lorre, and Béla Lugosi. Burton immersed himself in the Hammer films shot in vivid Technicolor, directed by the likes of Terence Fisher, starring Christopher Lee, Peter Cushing, and Michael Gough. He admired the luscious dreamscapes of director Federico Fellini, and was enchanted by the Italian horror directors, Mario Bava and Dario Argento, whose stylized films were filled with bright reds and dark purpose. He loved the Godzilla monster movies by Ishiro Honda, the low-budget films of Roger Corman, the campy Russ Meyer films that satirized conventional society, the horrible but memorable movies of Ed Wood, and science-fiction thrillers starring Charlton Heston. He spent his time watching The Twilight Zone and The Outer Limits on television. He was swept up by the magic of the stop-motion animation in Ray Harryhausen's animated sequences and the unique color palette of Basil Gogos illustrations on the covers of Famous Monsters of Filmland magazines (one of the few publications he avidly read). He appreciated the unconventional children's stories of Roald Dahl, and he became enthralled by the mysterious words of Edgar Allan Poe.

He also found a release in punk music—hard and fast and anti-establishment. He was attracted to anything dark, dramatic, emotional, subversive, enigmatic, and humorous.⁴ His playful attitude towards the dead formed at the same time. Growing up in a region with a large Hispanic

the place where all the monsters live, we see the monsters are happy, the Zieg is their friend, this is all good,
for it is the end!

population exposed Burton to the Mexican holiday, Día de los Muertos (Day of the Dead), where death is a festive celebration of life rather than a somber, taboo topic.

Much of his artwork, and many of his films, pull from these early influences. His short Vincent is a tribute to Vincent Price and quotes lines from Poe's poem, "The Raven." He later worked with Price again in Edward Scissorhands, and filmed an as-yet-unreleased documentary, Conversations with Vincent, that contains some of the last footage of Price alive. He has worked with Christopher Lee, Michael Gough, and Charlton Heston. Harryhausen's animated sequence from Jason and the Argonauts appears briefly in the Bones music video Burton directed for The Killers. Corpse Bride is suffused with the flavor of Día de los Muertos, where the underworld of the dead sings a lively tune, and the real world manifests itself as grim. The mood of both Sleepy Hollow and Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street echo those of the Hammer films. More saliently, Burton directed Ed Wood, a film about the notorious director. He adapted into a film Roald Dahl's book Charlie and the Chocolate Factory (also producing the animated adaptation of Dahl's James and the Giant Peach). An admirer of the abstract nightmarish artwork of Francis Bacon, Burton displays Bacon's painting, Figure with Meat, in Batman.

When asked in interviews how he became successful, Burton usually replies that he was just very lucky. His modesty overshadows his drive. A certain amount of luck features in any success story, but a combination of talent and perseverance, a singular vision, and an absolute need to communicate this has served him throughout his career. He knew early on that he wanted to be an artist, though he never formulated that into something as specific as a director.⁵ When only 17, Burton submitted a fully illustrated children's book to Walt Disney Productions, titled The Giant Zlig, detailing in rhyme the adventures of monsters living in the land of Zlv. He received a letter back from the editor who praised both the story and the imagery, though ultimately writing it might be too similar to Dr. Seuss for their current publishing needs. Indeed, Burton has often named Theodor Seuss

Geisel (better known as Dr. Seuss) as a strong influence. Dr. Seuss imbued his whimsical illustrations with subtle messages of anti-authority and other political leanings that appealed to the young Burton. To this day, Burton continues to write most of his verses in simple yet clever rhymes.

During his senior year in high school, Burton applied for and received a scholarship to attend The California Institute of the Arts (Cal Arts), where Walt Disney Studios had just set up a training school for prospective animators. Several of his sketchbooks still exist from this time period, and sprinkled amongst the nudes and Disney animation assignment sketches are Burton's beloved monsters and aliens. During Cal Arts, he worked his first summer as an "inbetweener" at Hanna-Barbera on the cartoon Super Friends and his second as a rotoscope artist on the 1978 Lord of the Rings. At the end of each school year, Burton animated a project in the hopes of being chosen for Disney's animation team. After his third year at Cal Arts, fighting debt, Burton created Stalk of the Celery Monster, a one-and-a-half-minute animated short about the horror of dentistry. It was a clever piece that demonstrated Burton's potential. Disney hired him.

Initially relieved to have the job, Burton soon realized that Disney's style poorly suited his own. He attempted to conform his methods to being an "inbetweener" on The Fox and the Hound, filling in animation between key frames. With typical humility and self-deprecation, he has often said that he couldn't draw Disney, and his foxes looked like "road kill."⁶ There was a fox or two scattered in his old sketchbooks, and they were a fair representation of a fox. His artistic talent was certainly good enough to reproduce a cartoon animal. But what is conveyed in their faint, forced lines is that they were painfully drawn and empty of the life and emotion that typically inhabits Burton's art and sets it apart. One can almost see him shuddering as he draws those cute foxes, feeling like road kill himself.

Faced with the prospect of six years on a project under someone else's sugary-sweet vision, Burton spiraled into a deep depression. At his nadir, he realized the importance of working on projects with which he identified and controlled. Hope arrived when Disney transferred him onto The Black Cauldron as a conceptual artist, where his imagination could finally roam free. He drew hundreds of ingenious characters that infused classic Disney style with his darker, comical streak. Disney never used any of it. In 1982, he conceptualized for a Halloween project, Trick or Treat, which the studio never produced.

Continuing in the tradition of his clever rhymes, Burton wrote Vincent, initially as a children's story about a boy who wanted to be like Vincent Price, his childhood hero. Burton and Rick Heinrichs, his coworker (and soon-to-be longtime collaborator), were given some money by Tom Wilhite, the head of creative development at Disney, to do a stop-motion animation test. Burton had always loved the handcrafted, three-dimensional feel of the puppets, imbuing in them a gravity and an energy that lifted them off the screen.⁷ He and Heinrichs used the money to develop Vincent into a short.

Burton sketched voraciously, pages and pages of cel-by-cel storyboards. If the devil is in the details, then Burton was that devil, at least in all matters artistic. He later moved away from storyboarding, but still invests himself in every aspect of a project, often sketching characters to shape the direction of his films.

Price, to Burton's delight, agreed to narrate Vincent. The two connected as people and as artists. It was a landmark moment for Burton, who considered Price his idol, someone whose films helped keep him alive in dark times.⁸ Working with Price was both emotionally and artistically gratifying, and perhaps one of the reasons he continued on in the filmmaking vein. Between Price's deliciously chilling voice and Burton's creepy but beautiful vision, the six-minute short leaves a lasting impression. It only ran for two weeks in one theatre alongside the teen drama Tex, but in a short time it won two awards at the Chicago Film Festival and the Critics' Prize at the Annecy Film Festival.⁹ Burton attempted to publish Vincent as a children's book, but Disney executives refused to do so without changing the ending into something they considered less grim. Burton refused, believing it would destroy its integrity, and the book was never published. During this time, Burton continued to create and sketch, generating The Nightmare Before Christmas, also intended for stop-motion animation, though Disney thought it too bizarre to pursue at that point.

Burton followed Vincent with his first live-action production, Hansel and Gretel. He places his distinctive stamp on the tale, morphing it into a colorful kung fu bonanza that was aired once on television and never seen again, disappearing into the mystery of cinema legend (not even Burton owns a copy). Then, in 1984, he directed Frankenweenie, a tale that combines his love of Frankenstein and of dogs into a 29-minute live-action short. It is an ode to Frankenstein, without following the narrative exactly. On many occasions Burton has paid tribute to films he loves by staying true to their feel and his memory of them, believing it's less meaningful to follow their plots rigidly.¹⁰

Walt Disney Studios intended to show the short before the re-release of Pinocchio. Instead, when Frankenweenie received a PG rating, they pulled the film. Disney's treatment of the film is an analogy for the dilemma of the film's main character. The dog, Sparky, has a good heart but looks frightening, so is persecuted for his looks. Similarly, the film was misperceived because of its imagery as something that would be too scary for children when, in reality, it contains a positive message—that people should not jump too quickly to judge others on looks alone. It is a theme that pervades Burton's art.

After having all of his projects shelved by Disney, Burton's desire to share his work strengthened. Though showing his films induced bouts of anxiety about how they will be judged or perceived, he realized the alternative was no better. To this day, although he can't even bear to view his films after they have been released, there is still a part of him that is driven to show his "mutated children"¹¹ to the public.

He would not have to wait much longer. That same year, Warner Bros showed Frankenweenie to actor-writer Paul Reubens, who was searching for a director who could appreciate the importance of art direction in a comedy. Reubens saw 30 seconds of Frankenweenie and knew he wanted Burton to direct PEE-WEE'S BIG ADVENTURE. Burton saw in the script something to which he could relate: a fun, zany character with intense passion. Even if that passion was for a bike, something that many would see as absurd, to Burton it was beautiful and pure. He agreed to do the movie, which was released in 1985. His first foray into feature-length filmmaking was so successful that he was approached about directing Batman. The project was not greenlit, however, until after he finished Beetlejuice, which grossed more money than the studio anticipated. In 1989, Batman was released amidst a swarm of speculation. It was a smashing success. Batman's popularity skyrocketed Burton to the top of the desirable directors' list, and the rest, as they say, is film history.

Burton's films revolve around characters that take form in his sketchpads. It is this unique group of misfits, perhaps more than his stories, that brand themselves in people's minds: lanky Jack Skellington, crusty Beetlejuice, innocent Edward Scissorhands, and the heartbreakingly hopeful Corpse Bride. Burton feels a personal connection to each one—from the misunderstood outsider to characters with a strong, single-minded passion. They live fully encapsulated in Burton's fairy tale worlds: morbid, fun, emotional, richly layered, and subversive.

Burton has the unusual ability to work on an intuitive level, allowing ideas to ferment in his subconscious before doodling them straight onto the page. It is only after he has drawn and re-drawn the same thing that he looks at it and thinks: this must mean something.¹² He can then flesh it out in more purposeful form, though he always sorts through things with a certain amount of unspoken, unconscious knowledge. He feels most comfortable working with people who understand this and relate in the same intuitive, non-verbal way, which is why people who work with Burton become like a family. It is not just that he chooses the same crew—people want to collaborate with him again and again. Burton pours himself into his work, and his enthusiasm lights a fire in others. That, combined with his endearing, always slightly bewildered persona, inspires fierce loyalty.

Through his unique movies and artwork, Burton has gained an undeniable following, becoming one of the few directors whose name and appearance are recognized. His films have provided respite for adolescents in the same way that Vincent Price's films helped him, but this isn't his motive for filmmaking. He feels his source material, which starts with his art, needs to come solely from within. He remains humble, and is uncomfortable with fame. Recognized frequently in major cities, Burton walks at a brisk pace, so that by the time it dawns on people who they have seen, he is already down the block. As ever, he prefers to observe rather than be observed.

CREATING THIS BOOK

If there is one thing about Tim Burton, it is that he is prolific. His mind never switches off. He has a dozen sketchbooks and notepads going at the same time, all with illustrations in various stages of development. He uses oils, acrylics, watercolor, markers, pencils, pens, glitter, and sometimes anything that seems appropriate, including pretzels and maraschino cherries. When he travels, he takes a notebook and frequently sketches who and what he sees. If no paper is readily handy or he has forgotten his sketchbook, he'll use napkins, coasters, scraps of paper—occasionally even tables and walls.

The designer, Holly Kempf, and I started this project by sorting through 4,500 pieces of artwork that had already been archived. In addition, a cabinet of boxes held sorted artwork never digitally archived due to sheer volume. We spent months sifting through these, selecting pieces for scanning. Then we were given piles of sketchbooks, gathered up and dropped onto our desk by Derek Frey, Tim's longtime, right-hand man. Several times, Derek (or occasionally Tim) would dig up a new sketchbook found in some dusty corner and add it to the teetering stacks. To complete the madness, we discovered artwork stashed in boxes in the storage room of Tim's office, mixed in with supplies, paperwork, old scripts, and anything else that could fit in a box. We dredged up a treasure trove, often napkins or scraps of paper that had been picked up with the intention of saving, but had been lost amidst the massive landslide of never-ending "stuff."

Holly and I scanned an additional 1,200 images, leaving thousands of sheets and pages in boxes and books that never saw the light of a scanner. Until our last week of work, we discovered new artwork. I have no doubt that there are more unfound items out there, hiding in quiet corners and hidden spaces.

The next step of narrowing down the artwork involved presenting selections to Tim, who went through the thousands of tiny outtakes printed on contact sheets with a magnifying glass. He would add artwork, we would chuck previously selected items—it was a constant give-and-take. Sometimes we had to convince him to allow us to include artwork (to an extremely doubtful Tim: "We swear people will like to look at your napkins and deskpads."). Sometimes he convinced us to remove certain pieces ("I don't think we need this." "But Tim! We love Ho-hum, the clown, can we keep him?" Shake of the head. "Nah, it's not that good, it's not even finished." "Please, please, please?" More shaking of the head, a quick lap around the room. "Maybe. Mmmmm, no,"). Eventually the book ended up being designed and printed in various stages of reform, hanging from every available surface at his office in London. In the beginning, Tim said, it was a little like "wrestling a blob to the ground." But, gradually, as we filled recycling bins with shredded outtakes, old designs, and old chapter ideas, the book took shape. We paced endlessly through hallways and rooms wallpapered with layers of fluttering proof pages. Each time, he would tell us what to add, take out, move, or change, and each pass felt like building to something greater. As with his films, we shared input, but he was ultimately the auteur. It was a painful but gratifying process. By the end we perused through over 10,000 images, of which approximately 1,000 are represented in some form here. It is by no means an end. We are quite confident that his artwork will continue to flow, and we know from experience that what he has already drawn that isn't included still could fill volumes. I hope you enjoy the fun, quirky, dark, and delightful art of Tim Burton as much as we have.

Misunderstood Monsters

Monsters occupy permanent residence in Tim Burton's brain. In his youth, he identified with the disfigured beasties who roamed across the cinema screens, mistaken as evildoers because of their appearance. They were large and expressive and grander than their lackluster human counterparts. Their woes left a lasting imprint on Burton, and he began creating his own group of misunderstood monsters.

At the age of seven, he assembled a skeleton costume for Halloween reminiscent of Jack Skellington, the main character two years later in Burton's stop-motion animated film, The Nightmare Before Christmas. Jack, the King of Halloween, tries to expand his horizons by assuming the role of Santa Claus, unintentionally jeopardizing Christmas instead.

In high school, Burton repeatedly sketched a boy with scissors for hands that years later became the basis for Edward Scissorhands. It's the story of an incomplete boy, unable to touch for fear of cutting those he cares about most. Though Edward's heart is pure, local suburbanites eventually turn against him.

Burton's first live-action film, Frankenweenie, follows a dog, Sparky, brought back to life by his boy owner. Developed out of Burton's drawings, it is an ode to Frankenstein, culminating in a mob chasing the misperceived animal.

This chapter also displays artwork from Batman and Batman Returns, including character art of Batman, the Penguin, and Catwoman. Burton turns these previously one-dimensional comic characters into rich, brooding psyches. Discarded or tortured by society, these three become their own forms of misguided madmen. Some of the chapter's most recent art is from Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street, a film adapted from a musical. It's a sympathetic portrayal of a razor-slicing murderer and a woman who turns victims into edibles.

No exploration of this subject would be complete without the man who played many of the tormented leads in the films Burton watched: Vincent Price. He appears in various aspects of Burton's artwork, most poignantly as illustrations from his first stop-motion animated short, Vincent, about a boy who wanted to be just like the famed horror actor. Upon Burton's request, Price narrated the short. The people Burton admires live on through his art, as does a theme that inspired him as a child – not to judge others on appearance alone.

BY TIM BURTON

"When my father was introduced to Tim Burton and to his artwork, the word I would use for his initial response was 'tickled.' I remember him telling me about this wonderfully quirky and immensely talented young Disney animator, who had created a short film about a young boy who wants to grow up to be Vincent Price. My dad loved everything about it—the quality and originality of the pen-and-ink drawings, the Poe-like verse, and, of course, the recognition of his influence on Tim's (and by proxy other fans') childhoods. He was flattered, bemused, intrigued, touched, and excited! In a way, Tim's project brought together many of the most important parts of my dad's life—art, horror, humor, poetry—and gave them back to him in the most fitting tribute anyone could have paid. My dad knew it, and he was both moved and grateful."

Author, 'Vincent Price: A Daughter's Biography'

"Ancient summers ago when I was 12, I was attracted to the tales of the macabre and the fantastic. I tried with all my might to read the delirious ramblings of Poe. Horror and suspense and the works of artists that promoted otherworldly events were intellectually fascinating and somehow often overlooked. Early in my career I saw Tim's short film 'Vincent' and completely fell back to those early influential days of loving the genre. Vincent Price was someone unattainable and larger than life, and here was a story about a bored young boy who wanted to be him. It is a genius piece of animation and storytelling. It was a secret gem of mine. I watched it on my old VHS player often. Then I worked with Tim on several projects, one of them 'Edward Scissorhands.' Vincent Price was in it, at 79 years of age, still larger than life and suddenly attainable."

SHORT MONTAGE OF EARLY PERSONAL IMPRESSIONS OF TIM:

- "Seeing his short film at the annual Cal Arts Animation show in 1979, 'Stalk Of The Celery Monster,' which stood out among all the student films that year not just for the sophistication of its storytelling and execution, but because his 90-second-long pencil test was hysterically funny.
- Pulling up to his Burbank apartment to pick him up on our way to see a film at the Cinerama Dome and observing him completely absorbed by something at ground level: the micro-world of an anthill.
- His return to the Disney Animation Building immediately after having all his wisdom teeth pulled out to spend the rest of the afternoon wandering the dark executive hallways like a ghost holding a bloody Kleenex.
- Visiting his Disney office for the first time and becoming immersed in the strange, beautiful world of characters he'd drawn and pinned on the walls – a world horrifyingly funny, yet appealing and emotionally resonant. It was confounding that the feature animation producers at the time felt his drawings and design sensibility weren't three-dimensional enough to be used on a Disney film. I felt certain they were wrong and wanting to prove it to myself, I sculpted some of his characters. The challenge was to use form and texture to bring his creations into the presence of light without losing their graphic elegance and innate character. Something unusual and gratifying emerged from that experiment, and a long and exciting collaboration with Tim followed."

"I've had the good fortune to see the images Tim dashes off to communicate an important thought to his collaborators. Economically but sublimely drawn, they often put across one simple-but-great idea. His narrative temperament dictates an expressionistic visual style that selectively reveals the emotional heart of his story: one that entertains without burying meaning beneath multiple layers of expository clutter and gratuitous business."

"Since I was a child, I have loved the world of the twisted and the dark and fantastic, and the funny and the innocent... and Tim is all these things. By the time we did 'The Nightmare Before Christmas' I knew his art well and always looked forward to seeing bits and pieces of his stuff. This time, our entire work was based solely on his drawings. We had no script at that point, and we were running out of time, so we went ahead with just him telling me the story and me looking at his many character drawings. It was more than enough to go on. I understood very clearly who was who and what was what. Imagining Jack and the others as real characters was simple (and a lot of fun). Coming up with songs for them was surprisingly easy."

"All I had the first time I went to work with Tim on 'Edward Scissorhands', aside from the images arriving in my mind, was a tiny drawing that Tim had made. One look at that drawing was all I needed to understand what Edward was about. It has been exactly the same ever since. In that respect, Tim and I are fortunate. We have a natural affinity, a mutual understanding. Even if we have not yet spoken, or specifically discussed the character, our visions always align, somehow. Miraculously. And when we do speak, the conversations between us might be so abstract that to the casual ear our musings add up to little more than puerile nonsense. This, of course, may be so, but nevertheless, the understanding that exists there, between our respective viewpoints, is, in all things, perfectly lucid and always solid."

"At first Stan Winston had a hard time wrapping his head around Edward Scissorhands. 'How can he have scissors for hands? And who made him? And, and...it doesn't make sense!' 'No, Stan, it doesn't. That's the fantastic part about it!' we all cried. Stan prided himself on making things as real as possible by having all obvious questions answered in the development process. He was used to working with directors who used science and research to help create characters, and here he was helping to transform Johnny Depp into a vintage German expressionistic boy made from a cooking robot that had scissors for hands. We kept saying. 'But, Stan, it's a fairy tale.' Then one day Stan came in much more relaxed and said. 'I get it...it's a fairy tale! Let's just make it look great, and Tim will do all the rest.'"

"Tim is an artist of great talent and individual style. His performance in 'Hoffa' underlines his talent as a consummate actor. I am so happy that he chose to become a filmmaker and not just another great painter, who would only get the recognition he truly deserves after he's dead, and guys who barely can hold a toothbrush, yet alone a paint brush, would wind up with all of his work hanging on their wall—and at least 90 percent of his money. I love this guy!"

"After I earned the part of Mrs. Lovett via the traditional route of a lengthy audition process, Tim came to my kitchen looking shocked. 'I found this original drawing from 20 years ago,' he said. 'It looks like you and Johnny. I drew you before I knew you existed.' Everything starts with a drawing. From one tiny picture grows a great big moving one. God knows, maybe he drew me into existence. Although my parents might contest that."

Alien-Nation

Welcome to the explosive universe of non-earthly beings. Tim Burton has drawn and painted a host of aliens, from green Martians to triffid-like invaders. His love of all things alien is rooted in another of Burton's television and film obsessions – science fiction from the 1950s and '60s.

This chapter is full of chaos, destruction, and “what ifs.” Burton playfully explores the possibilities of life on other planets, and, in his vision, Earth is far from safe. Attackers descend from every angle, ready to destroy; gigantic aliens troll the city skylines fighting off planes and bombs; giant, three-headed hydra women smile as they topple buildings. One can see how much fun he has designing ways that the planet could be invaded, poking fun at the seriousness with which we take ourselves.

Burton took this love to the next level when he adapted a series of campy Topps Trading cards from the '60s into his Mars Attacks! motion picture. Its mirthful and malicious aliens are a throwback to the alien invasion films of the '50s. As with most of Burton's projects, the characters were developed through his sketches – including the Martians' signature, glittery costumes and derisive personalities. Starting pre-production immediately after Ed Wood, Burton later said he was subconsciously inspired to make an “Ed Wood” film with a big budget.

Also included in this chapter is a first look at the artwork from the ill-fated Superman Lives. Burton spent a year developing the film, and was close to shooting when Warner Bros. pulled the plug. Burton's take on Superman was different than the iconic Americana superhero in spandex; it focused on the struggles of a man from a different planet who never quite fits in.

Using an assortment of mediums from pencil to pastel, and the occasional splash of glitter, some of Burton's most colorful artwork can be found in this chapter.

"Tim's world is an eclectic one. In 'Mars Attacks!' shapely femme fatales sit side by side with the darker Martian villains. During his daily visits to our workshop, Tim would do his crazy little sketches of these alien invaders. The broad sweeps are more important than fussy detail. The real strength in Tim's artwork is his appreciation of form with strong shapes and exaggerated proportions. Within a few seemingly simple pen lines, he creates bold silhouettes like the triangular outline of the Ambassador's sweeping cape with its iconic collar or the hourglass outline of the Martian Girl. You would be mistaken for thinking that some of Tim's rough sketches are rudimentary, loose or naïve, for they hold vital information, demonstrate a great delicacy, sensitivity, consistent keen eye, and a stunning vision."

IAN MACKINNON

"We were a little taken aback when Tim first approached us with the 'Mars Attacks!' Topps trading cards. Norm Saunders' artwork depicted a violent carnage that seems a long way from the candy-colored world inhabited by Jack Skellington and Co. Tim, however, is able to paint the gory imagery of dead dogs, burning buildings, and dismembered bodies with dark, macabre humour and a unique visual twist that make them not only acceptable but strangely beautiful."

People

Tim Burton's sketchbooks are his diary. He records what he sees in pictures rather than written description. He takes people who strike him in some way, and pens their memory into his sketchpad. Often he accentuates the characteristics that most strike him: the form of a couple dancing or the woman with pink highlights that match her pink ice cream cone. He has a fascination with people and their own worlds, and his art is a way of connecting to that.

Burton claims that he can't draw properly, but that hasn't stopped him from keeping his visual diary where pictures are far more descriptive than words.

By emphasizing certain elements in his portraits, he has taken the basics of the human form and imbued it with emotion and impact, controlled solely through his brush, pencil, marker, pastel, or pen—and sometimes all of them at once.

Fans might be surprised by what they see here, the lesser-known side of Tim Burton. Who knows, maybe amongst these pages, they'll even find themselves.

"An art historian by education, and an art collector since childhood, my father's particular passion was for drawings, because he felt they captured the process of the artist, the heart and soul of an artist, in a way that paintings never can. My father absolutely loved Tim's expressionistic and quirky line drawings. He felt that Tim harkened back to some of his favorite artists, such as Goya, Max Beckmann, Heinrich Kley, William Brice, and Howard Warshaw. He loved seeing the drawings for each of Tim's projects, and discussing them with him. He took immense pleasure and pride in Tim's success as a filmmaker, but respected him most for being a true artist."

"I think most artists paint pictures to be seen. What may make this book special is that most of these pictures Tim never intended to be seen by anyone other than himself. He paints or draws because he has to. He doesn't paint to exhibit but to quench the need to express himself. It's a compulsion. Since the day I met Tim I have never known him not to be without a pen in his left breast pocket. And more often than not with an attendant ink stain bleeding through the material. He has to draw as he has to breathe. Take away his pen and he'd go insane."

HELENA BONHAM CARTER
Actress & Partner to Tim Burton

"We were having dinner in a pub in the country, and I noticed a man kept staring at me. Outside, as I was leaving, he approached me quite innocently. 'I hope you don't mind me saying so, but you look exactly like you've been drawn by Tim Burton. Do you know who I mean?' I replied that not only did I know whom he meant but that I had two children by him and, in fact, he was standing behind him. The man looked round and nearly died."

HELENA BONHAM CARTER
Actress & Partner to Tim

"Tim understands the human heart in a way very few people do. He knows the pain of the misunderstood, of the odd, and even of the mad. He celebrates them in a way that is both totally unique, compassionate, tender, terrifying, and often hilarious. But there always remains a dignity to his characters. Every role in a Tim Burton movie is a character role. His 'heroes' are the very outcasts he loves. The cross-dressing, wide-eyed director or the dying legendary heroin-addicted actor, the unfinished boy who lives in a castle, the bride who is a corpse, the employed cadavers in office waiting rooms, and the bored desperate housewives—all color his vision. He's always finding the odd splendor in the world that he creates, the humor and heartache and soulful complexity in the fairy tale, possessing that uncanny ability to humanize and bring a certain gallantry to those who may be wreaking havoc within the story, all of which talents are purely Tim's own."

WINONA RYDER
Actress

"If his work seems to inhabit an identifiable Burtonesque world, it's probably because Tim is compelled by his imagination to dwell in a place for which only he has a map. Absurd humor; darkly imaginative surrealism; characters at once insane and perfectly reasonable who harbor anguished longing, driving obsession, strange beauty, sorrow, love, anger — the drawings record his impression of universal emotional states. We're entertained by their heightened depiction and then startled to recognize ourselves in them."

Animals

It is no surprise that animals roam around Tim Burton's artwork; his choice of subject matter is often an expression of affection. In his films, the animals often have more personality and elicit more sympathy than their human counterparts. It is apparent that he sees them as intelligent, non-judgmental companions. Perhaps, as with his favorite collaborators, he appreciates their ability to communicate on a non-verbal level.

Growing up, Burton always had pets. He fondly remembers how he once kept a wild raccoon, Bonnie, as a pet, whose clear intelligence connected with Burton on an emotional level. But it is obvious that his real soft spot in the Animal Kingdom is dogs. His favorite pet, his late Chihuahua, Poppy, is seen repeatedly in his artwork, sometimes sharing canvas space with her Chihuahua friend, Violet.

He explores many aspects of animals in society, from the four-legged friend to the overly pampered poodle to the less fortunate ones used as fur coats. His movies usually include animals as sidekicks and companions that play an important role in the storyline. In Frankenweenie, the dog is the focus of the story. In The Nightmare Before Christmas, ghostly Zero lights the way for Jack. Burton designed an episode of the television show, Amazing Stories, around the misunderstood and abused pooch in Family Dog. Also represented in this chapter is the zombie dog sidekick in Vincent; a spread of animals from Big Fish, including the ringmaster-turned-werewolf and the daring "suicidal cat"; the penguins in Batman Returns; the unfortunate creatures in Alice in Wonderland forced into servitude by the Red Queen; Ichabod Crane riding his trusty steed in Sleepy Hollow; Mummy Boy's mummified companion from The Melancholy Death of Oyster Boy & Other Stories; and primates from Burton's spin on Planet of the Apes. However, many of these animals were never intended for the screen at all, they are simply an expression of Burton's soft spot for the animal world.

"Tim has done several series of personal art photo shoots. I've worked on some of these with him, making prosthetics and props and helping with make-up. The set-ups were based on his concept art. Everything was shot on an enormous Polaroid camera that Tim nicknamed the 'Doctor Seuss' camera. These photo projects fed Tim his dose of uninterrupted, non-studio-influenced work. It taught those of us who worked with him the importance of doing certain artistic things for ourselves. We are in the film business, which, although hugely creative in its own right, is still a massive collaboration with many outside opinions and suggestions. You have to go back to your early dreams and roots from time to time."

"Tim's energy and vision is contagious. When you work with him, you will go to any length to help bring the film to life—even when you're standing waist deep in freezing Alabama river water at 4am with holes in your rubber waders, desperately trying to puppet a catfish. We spent several days on 'Big Fish' working with effects to build a support structure for Billy Crudup to walk on, and have our animatronic fish swim around his legs after he lets go of his 'father.' All the testing had gone well until a boat crashed into the structure on the morning of the shoot. We thought we fixed it. Tim and the crew showed up before sunrise as we shivered in the water, the local alligators and snap turtles splashing around us. There was only this day left, and it had to be done perfectly. It was time for the first take. The setting is ethereal and stunning in its tranquil beauty; Billy is acting; we have the fish moving along nicely; all's going great—when suddenly the fish shudders as it moves around his legs and stops dead. 'Cut. What's up guys? Didn't you check this out this morning?' 'Yeah, let's try again.' Next take, the same thing happens. Buggery, buggery.

Tim's not happy; the sun's at its most perfect moment. We're all dying inside. A cold sweat is running down my back. I radio our crewmember, Matt Heimlich, to check the rigging again. Last chance. I cross my fingers, and the camera rolls. The mist rises from the river, the sunlight catches the trees in the distance, and the moment is perfect. Billy performs brilliantly; the fish swims up to him. Shane and I are trying our best not to let our numb fingers affect the performance. We look over as we move the puppet's head and tail in time with Matt moving the rig around the base of Billy's legs, and it keeps on going, swims around him and down the river off to the horizon and then under the water. 'Cut.' We look over to the camera, Tim looks happy and smiles. We all let out a collective sigh of relief. Even with the icy cold water and the local animals lurking in the murky river, we would have done whatever it took to get the shot for Tim. He was so into it. To have given him less than he was putting into the story would have been unacceptable to us."

"For 50 years, I have produced films, working with some of the most gifted directors of all time. The past nine years I have been producing films directed by Tim Burton (probably the most telling reason I'm still in the business). Tim is unquestionably as much of a visionary and as talented as anyone I've ever worked with and certainly the most artistic and imaginative. He thinks visually, not only in general and broad conceptual terms, but in the detailed minutiae as well. In his films, like his art, he highlights the essential elements yet keeps them uncluttered and easily interpreted. I have studied this for five films, and every time I'm convinced I know how he is going to approach a scene, I am constantly surprised — even if I mentally try to 'Burtonize' it in advance. The one thing I can be certain of is pace and tempo. Tim will never overindulge or linger. His work is never tedious or boring. It's just not in his bones."

RICHARD D. ZANUCK

"Alice in Wonderland is my first opportunity to work with Tim. Every bit of direction I get from him comes from his heart. Combine that with his distinctive vision, and we are graced with the opportunity to see and experience the world as filtered through that brilliant 'Burton brain'."

"Everyone at Stan Winston Studios felt Tim was a kindred spirit. He helped rekindle those long lost days as kids watching the Hammer Horror films and Italian movies of Mario Bava, or the old Universal Monster movies. There are very few times in your career where you find someone that makes a contemporary version of the movies you so dearly loved as a child, and it's even rarer to find someone that does it time and again in such a unique fashion."

What is it?

The creatures in this chapter can't be described in any simple way. They are pepper girls with fuzzy heads and feeler-frenzied, winged beasts. They are everything mashed together and nothing in particular. This is Tim Burton at his most inventive. He blends many of the things he loves into his own creations. No number of appendages or eyes is too many. Some are hypnotizing, others horrific. There's a frenetic pace that represents a manic energy.

Several of Burton's concepts for The Black Cauldron are being shown for the first time in this book. Though all of his ideas were unique, well thought out, and clever, none were ever used in the film.

Included here are two of Burton's large-format Polaroid pictures. They are part of a series he termed "Unnatural History." Burton designed the sculptures and scenes he envisioned. With a team of people, these concepts were recreated three-dimensionally, and were taken on location to Death Valley, Calif., where Burton photographed them with a rare, 235-pound camera that prints 20"x24" Polaroid images.

These are more than just pictures, they are something living. They are Burton's own family of beings, most only creeping, crawling, and dragging themselves along the pages of Burton's sketchpads and canvasses. They are the synthesis of an idea. Gifts to children and friends. Observations, answered with a drawing – what if there was this sort of thing? Well, now there is.

the last of its kind.

"Tim resonates with the young because, like any good artist, he has kept in touch with the child he once was. Or rather still is. His inner child is pretty outer. And his art has the artless simplicity, freedom and naïveté of a child. Tim's five-year-old son and he both love to draw monsters. Sometimes it's difficult to tell who drew what. And I mean that as a compliment to both."

HELENA BONHAM CARTER

"His drawings, his films are unique. Truly Tim. His twisted macabre sense of humor, and his wacky style are instantly recognizable. I think that is what turns a mere drawing into a work of art. I met Tim when he was fresh out of Cal Arts, and I thought to myself, 'This kid is going to go places,' and he did. Weird places, and he took us along for the ride. What a fun ride it has been. I always look forward to the next trip that he takes us on."

Clowns, Puppets & Ventriloquist Dummies

Tim Burton grew up finding clowns creepy. Bozo the Clown, a popular television character in the 1950s, frightened him, and Burton was a teenager during the trial of John Wayne Gacy Jr., a serial killer known as the “Killer Clown.” It’s not much of a stretch to see why puppets and ventriloquist dummies would fall into the same category. All three represent people hiding, either behind a mask or inside of a doll. Their hiding allows them a freedom that makes them dangerous. Burton has said that the scariest form of freedom is insanity – because it is a complete freedom from the conventions of society.¹ That, to him, is what puppets, dummies, and clowns embody. The most extreme case of this in one of his films is the Joker in Batman: wicked and wild and following his own path.

In Burton’s art, the light is always interwoven with the dark, two parts of life that can never be separated. Puppets and clowns are supposed to bring smiles, but in his world, they are more apt to maim and torture. No better place is this visually represented than in the smiling puppet that cuts the neck of its own master or a jolly man in polka dots holding a bottle of deadly poison.

CLOWN MAN

"Once, quite early in our relationship, during a disagreement, I came upon a drawing on his desk of me as a huge hydrocephalic head surrounded by question marks. Later, I mentioned I was somewhat disturbed by this vision of me. He reassured me I should only have reason to worry if he didn't draw. His drawings are a kind of exorcism of his darkness. An excavation of uncomfortable things from his internal landscape. I often think that's how he has remained surprisingly sane, rare for someone so creative. It also explains why his art is so affecting — it is as though he has a direct route to his unconscious."

Too Much Free Time

In Tim Burton's free time, he draws. When he's supposed to be working, he draws. When he's in a meeting he dreads, or a press conference that makes him uncomfortable, he draws. It occupies and soothes him, and sometimes helps him to work out ideas. A restless man with a clever brain, Burton is constantly watching scenes unfold in daily life and travel that spark in him ideas he feels compelled to express on paper.

His artistic mind drives him to draw anywhere and everywhere. Deskpads, envelopes, napkins, deskpads, bits of torn paper—all become his canvas. It's a record of a moment that doesn't make it into a sketchpad. Often his drawings are simply that: a representation of whatever is on his mind at the moment. Other times they are accompanied by words or rhymes. Combining his astute observations on life with the malleable English language, he has created a set of visual puns.

Sometimes these pieces are a commentary on life, like the blood-spattered customer requesting more bullets for his gun. Occasionally the drawings strike to a deeper truth, like the idea that mothers can sometimes be monsters in the eyes of a child. Most times, the end result is simply humorous, such as the couple that likes to hold hands, translated by his pen into two people holding severed hands. Regardless of their message, these drawings share one thing in common: Burton created them for no other purpose than to amuse himself and pass the time.

Both of them never lost the gift of knowing what it's like to be a child — a very rare gift. I try to take as much of the unnecessary clutter of the production out of his universe. Unfortunately, the way the movie business is conducted these days, that's almost impossible. Freaks, Friends & Foes

Best known for his highly imaginative, distinctive, and sympathetic characters, Tim Burton creates a line-up of freaks and geeks in his artwork. These are the non-conformists, by choice or design. Burton has championed people with whom he can identify, who express the same frustrations, alienations, and desires he feels. He creates visual metaphors: someone who is falling apart at the seams is literally stitched together; a boy who feels he makes a mess of everything leaves a stain wherever he goes.

Tormented and demented, passionate and deluded, hopeful and forlorn, the people he creates strike a chord so that no matter their bizarre appearances or awkward behavior, or perhaps because of just that, we can identify and find parts of ourselves within them. With their inhuman appendages and deformities, these misfits manage to speak to what it means to be human. We feel not just sympathy, but empathy. That doesn't mean they're always good. Sometimes they're wonderfully misguided. From the gluttonous Augustus Gloop to the raging Red Queen, these misguided freaks wreak spectacular havoc.

Characters from the movies Alice in Wonderland, Sleepy Hollow, Big Fish, and Corpse Bride appear here. The Melancholy Death of Oyster Boy & Other Stories was Burton's first book to compile some of these deformed characters accumulated in his sketchbooks. The same characters reappeared in The World of Stainboy, a series of six flash-animated shorts produced for the web. These victims of circumstance juxtapose the funny and the tragic, so that the viewer wants to laugh and cry and utter compassionate murmurings all at the same time.

"Tim is not one for long meetings. We first met to discuss 'Charlie and the Chocolate Factory' at a hotel restaurant in Santa Monica. By the time our iced tea came, the meeting was pretty much over. He told me what he wanted (the entire Roald Dahl book) and what he didn't (smug Disney children). I pitched him my take on Charlie, Wonka and the ending. Much nodding, a handshake, and I was off to write. I don't think I spoke with him again until we were prepping to shoot at Pinewood."

"I don't think of Tim with humor, oddly enough. I think of him with deep emotion and sensitivity. Yet he has such humor in his artwork—when you see his pictures they just make you laugh, whereas with Roald, when you read his words it makes you laugh. So the combination of the visual and the written couldn't be more perfect."

"Tim's drawings are part of his process. I always feel relief wandering into Tim's office and seeing the scenes and characters pinned to the walls: a proud Oompa-Loompa, a spooky witch's house. The drawings show he's translated and internalized those elements for the movie. And it inspires me to write things he'll want to draw."

JOHN AUGUST
Screenwriter, 'Charlie and the Chocolate Factory'

"When Tim asked me to be the Oompa Loompa in 'Charlie and the Chocolate Factory,' he pulled out a drawing of four Oompa Loompas. He said, 'I know you're 4 ft. 4 in. but we're going to make you look 2 ft. 7 in.' I was so impressed—he knows what he wants. I've been in the business almost 35 years, and I've never seen a director showing artwork.

We did a camera test to see if it would work (at that time they thought they would use other small people and put my head on their bodies). Unfortunately, they realized you cannot match the bodies, so I turned to everyone and said—'Listen, I'll do it myself.' Tim gave me a high five and said, 'That's what I like to hear!'

From then on I was all the Oompa Loompas. He used to come to me and ask, 'How many Oompa Loompas in your family now?' By the end it was 165. Tim had a vision. The other actors said I stole all the work from them. I said, 'I didn't steal it from anyone - this is Tim Burton's creation.' That's one of the hardest movies I've done. That kind of part comes only once in a lifetime."

"My favorites of Tim's were always the twisted little things: Char-boy and many other tragic and unfortunate creatures. He seemed to encompass the best of Edward Gorey (of whom I was a huge fan) and many others before him, yet his work was never derivative. Always original. Always wonderfully twisted, deliciously dark, and sometimes very sweet as well. Often all these at the same time. Tim and his many characters are, and will forever be, originals."

"When working on 'Big Fish,' I had my first fitting with Danny DeVito. As I was showing Tim the photos, he pulled out a sketch, and it was almost the exact idea of the costume, of course with his personal touches, which really brought the character to life. I can never thank him enough for the respect he shows his fellow artists and craftspeople, he really understands what it means to create."

"I never know if I'm going to be in a Tim Burton film or not. I personally presume not while the rest of the world seems to presume I am. I stay well out of things, and if he feels it's right then I trust he'll inform me sometime. Usually he says, 'well, it had to be you because, look, I've drawn you.' In the case of the Red Queen, he said this and produced a picture of a very angry, red-faced, large-headed queen. With my eyebrows."

"Congruent sensibilities aside, most importantly we trust one another. And trust is paramount. It gets the best out of either one of us, knowing that, whatever the weather brings, the other has the others' back. Perhaps, from my side of the relationship, there is some morsel of luck involved. My great luck is that Tim is a genius. A filmmaker of the most authentic kind. He also happens to be a great friend, an ideal conspirator and a comrade of the very finest ilk. There is not a soul I would rather accompany when advancing into battle on the studio front."

Around the World

For a visual person like Tim Burton, travel offers an abundance of imagery. Burton likes taking photographs, but if something really grabs him, he'll record it in a drawing. When visiting other countries, he is constantly compelled to draw what he sees, whether it's a strange spidery family in India or a man transporting a dead dog on his bike in China. Sometimes a place will remind him of an iconic, beloved film; he can't help but draw Godzilla when he is in Tokyo.

Travel, especially for work, is rarely a restful occasion. Often, it flies by in a jet-lagged haze. Film location scouts, festivals, and press tours happen at a grueling pace. Yet he is creatively stimulated by finding himself in peculiar situations, surrounded by odd individuals in an unfamiliar place, during hours when he normally should be sleeping. By the end of the night he'll have a whole stack of paper or crinkled napkins, some with food stains incorporated into his drawings. These are usually, but not always, the people he sees around him: the singer at the piano, the bartender, the bejeweled and bedazzled couple at the next table.

At the end of such trips, sleep-deprived and bewildered by a blur of strange sights, Burton often wonders aloud why he subjects himself to these frequent escapades. But it won't be long before he finds his way to another strange locale, paper and pen ready to record the interesting experiences and the fascinating people he encounters around the world.

"Tim loves Paris. He particularly loves the Ritz Hotel. A habitual insomniac, he only sleeps well at the Ritz. It's an expensive sleeping pill, but one over the years he loves to revisit. The bar man at the Ritz now automatically gives him a packet of crayons and a notepad with his Nautilus cocktail, a drink that Tim particularly likes because of its shade of blue. But I don't think Tim is happier than when he's in the hotel room and has his headphones on listening to extra loud music and drawing in black ink or brushing his watercolours. And then he is truly away, truly off some place else, travelling."

"It's safe to say that Paris loves Tim. It's the city of the artist. Tim wears his beret, something he's had in his uniform for years, and he looks as if he belonged there. We go on a tour of our favourite places and we people watch and he people draws. He draws on the placemats of the Café Flore; the beer mats of Deux Magots; napkins, coasters; scraps of anything conveniently at hand become annotated with his idiosyncratic graffiti."

Love

An emotional person, Tim Burton frequently explores the most unpredictable of human feelings—love. This love comes in many forms. It is the inventor from Edward Scissorhands, holding up a cookie heart and deciding to make a boy he can love; it is stitched-together Sally and skeletal Jack sharing their loneliness in The Nightmare Before Christmas; it is Sparky meeting his bride; it is a love triangle between Victor, the Corpse Bride, and Victoria; it is a concept sketch of the Joker finding a joker woman to love.

In love Burton finds all of the things he believes to be integral to the human experience—danger, chaos, awkwardness, and sweetness. In his world, monsters and freaks can find tenderness and companionship. He has captured the feeling of floating that love first brings with it, expressing this as a grinning monster consisting solely of hearts, lifted through the clouds by its tentacle balloon hearts. For Burton, being head over heels is a darling shrunken head floating over red shoes.

Love, as anything worthwhile, is perilous. Kisses can be lethal. Giving your heart to someone can sometimes mean cutting your own heart out. He captures what it means to be human and, in doing so, makes it something tangible, expressible, and understandable.

"I have always been immensely grateful to Tim for providing my father with the most fitting swan song to his career. Many actors fade into obscurity. My father's last film was 'Edward Scissorhands,' playing a role created expressly for him. It was a gorgeous part, lovingly directed by Tim. It was the perfect ending to my father's career, but it also served to do something that mattered very much to him. It introduced him to a whole new generation of fans. My father always wanted to stay current—and without Tim and 'Edward Scissorhands,' many young people would never have known him."

"Shying away from realism, Tim's drawings are simple, loose, imaginative and full of energy. He has a special sense of humor, never does what is expected, avoids conventional visuals and stories, and always adds a peculiar, unexpected twist. Sharing creativity on the character design for 'Corpse Bride' I felt a connection with him from day one. He encouraged me to flow and enjoy—'keep pushing the envelope'—and I felt privileged to work with him."

"Tim doesn't do love letters. He does love pictures. To be absolutely honest, Tim didn't really speak much when we first met on 'Planet of the Apes.' I said that there should be an orphanage set up for the abandoned sentences of Tim Burton. He does words now, but at the beginning he'd just give me pictures. He courted me mutely with these self-portraits of his disembodied head. Who wouldn't fall? We ran away on a road trip and hibernated in a cabin to get to know each other. And I watched him draw and paint, little picture after little picture."

"His prolificness is astonishing. Truly. If he hadn't had to dig out his art from storage for this book, I would have been oblivious to just how much he has drawn. It's like meeting another half of the man I thought I knew. But this is very Tim. He is a private man and particularly when it comes to his art. I stay way out of it. And he almost does himself, in that he hardly ever discusses what he is marinating. As if the mere talking or partaking with the rational side of the brain will disable the creative unconscious at work.

This makes him sound precious which he absolutely is not. He is always decrying that he can't draw. What he means is that he can't do the literal, representational kind of drawing. And thank god not. He is a true original. Throughout the assembling of this book he has repeatedly said, as though surprised that anyone should be interested, 'I don't know what it is but it isn't art.' Of course it's art, because it's the art of his inimitable soul. I'm sure he'd half wish for all of the contents of this book to remain in storage. He has, more literally than most film directors, had a life in pictures. This book is that—his life in pictures—thus far."

Happy Horrodays

Overtly visual, holidays offered the young Tim Burton a sense of the seasons amidst the blindingly sunny suburban days that otherwise ran together interminably.¹ His favorite celebration, perhaps obvious from the imagery in which he delights, is Halloween. For this one masked day, people have complete freedom from convention and societal restrictions. Ghouls, skeletons, and monsters rule the streets. This was a day where he could be the creatures he admired. The holiday also represents the man's artwork: a fun, creative display that isn't meant to scare but only seems scary because of its superficially dark content.

His other favorite holiday is Christmas. This fondness often takes the form of a perverse delight in its absurdities. A fat man in a red suit is raised to kingly status, and people decorate houses and bodies with chintz and gaudy trinkets. One can almost see Burton's gleeful smile as he draws. But perhaps the most visually defining element for Burton is snow. In films and in his drawings, it's always snowing at Christmastime – even in the most unlikely of places (perhaps as reparation for a childhood filled with warm holidays).

This chapter shows scenes from the never-produced Trick or Treat, where child-eating monsters with lollipops hang out with pumpkin creatures who use themselves as piñatas. His famous confluence of the two holidays became the stop-motion animated film, The Nightmare Before Christmas. He began illustrating the idea when he worked at Disney, but was only able to produce it a decade later, after he gained prominence (the original story also became his first published book). Inspired by Dr. Seuss and Rankin/Bass Christmas specials, Burton created Jack Skellington and his menagerie of companions. It is one of the most defining movies of his career and the visual style that would brand him into the minds of fans, with its holiday world of oddball characters, both dead and alive.

"I remember being completely bowled over by how well Tim's early sketches translated into three-dimensional constructed puppets. I kept the sculpt of Sally on my desk for weeks next to Tim's drawing, marveling at how clear her design read. Even as the sculpt became an armature casting, and the rag dresses were sewed and fitted onto her sutured body, she never lost the dynamic, graphic, power of his original drawing. It was as if he had spent so many years with those characters before we even started to make that movie that it was just a natural progression to see them come to life."

ALLISON ABBATE

"Tim Burton's work and career as an artist is undoubtedly unique, especially in the world of cinema where his skills are at their most original and creative. However, it is his work as a passionate advocate of model stop-motion animation, which he uses to realise his art, that for me is so distinctive and outstanding.

His surreal style of using stories and characters that are both dark and charming is always a pleasure to watch. His stylised characters, with their long arms and fingers, occupy the weird worlds that materialize from Tim's mind.

Tim's style and filmmaking have brought new and bold horizons to the art form of model stop-motion animation, a technique on which I have spent my life. He designs impressive scenes that more often than not use dozens of models, each one animated separately, which I always envy because animating such a number of models was not something I was ever able to do because of working alone, time and money."

Strange Places & Other Things

A curved candy house sits on a pastel landscape, trees open like skulls to admit entrance, and a tiny inventor prepares to test out his complicated torture device on a victim. A parade of whimsical places, fairy tales, and bizarre scenes play out in the pages of this chapter.

Partly from his animation background, partly because he is a natural, visual storyteller, many of Burton's singular paintings and drawings have a lively narrative contained within a single image. Inspired by Van Gogh, whose paintings he saw as capturing a force that made them feel alive, Burton has divested an intensity into his own artwork that practically lifts it off the page.

Both his art and films are visually delicious, from the expansive, candy-coated world of Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, to the swirling vistas in Hansel & Gretel and Frankenweenie. Other film-related art in this chapter are PEE-WEE'S BIG ADVENTURE, Edward Scissorhands, Beetlejuice, Big Fish, and concept art for The Black Cauldron.

Some of these strange places seem like they arise from a dream. Others draw you into a nightmare. Much of the imagery finds root in fairy tales—rich stories set in fantasy landscapes, whose dark tones hint at the truths of life. His love of inventions and mad scientists shine through these pages. For anyone who has watched his films, it's easy to see the connection—Burton is his own sort of inventor, designing the elaborate gadgetry that comes to life in his movies.

His art makes one want to further explore the places he creates. What happens to the boy strapped to the bed with a spiked canopy? Where does the yellow brick road really lead? It is easy to spend hours perusing his artwork, finding ourselves lost in the sweeping horizons of Burton's pen.

"I wanted a director who not only understood, but understood the connection between film and art direction, as it pertained to comedy. At the time of PEE-WEE'S BIG ADVENTURE, that didn't go hand in hand. When I saw Tim's short 'Frankenweenie,' I could tell in the first 30 seconds that this was the guy. He went so beyond what anyone would do, and yet it's exactly perfect. That mind connected to that eye is really what Tim Burton is loved for. He's at the top of the list of people who understand beauty and art, and how they connect to each other to translate into something that speaks to people."

It was one of the most creative experiences I've had in over 50 years of filmmaking. What I admire about Tim Burton is he always has a parade of colorful and unusual pictures dancing around in his head. Some of them escape to paper, others find their way to film. I'm always eager to see which of them will emerge next. I am a fan!"

SHANE MAHAN

"His small watercolor paintings come from him fully formed to inform. A single sketch of the chocolate river boat contained all the ideas that were important to him: the viking-ship profile, the size of the boat relative to the people, its colors, and the Oompa Loompa costumes—all instantly there in a six-inch painting. It makes designing for him creative and collaborative; he knows what he wants and so we know what needs to be done. Each of his paintings and drawings for Charlie were inserted at just the right time to be maximum help in articulating and actualizing the vision. Tim's art flows directly from the source, so that his private internal story can be expressed just purely enough for those of us engaged in producing it to get to its essence, without Tim having to get into elaborate explanations one might demand of another director, which would be anathema for Tim to verbalize.

My memories are of working at the height of the capability of a crack team. There was just enough time and hardly enough money to execute the intent. Without Tim giving definitive answers to all of us, it would have been easy to trip. Unlike most films, which might have one big centerpiece set, 'Charlie and the Chocolate Factory' had six or seven, each as vast and complex as the next. It needed daily guidance, kneading, and gesture from Tim to allow us to pull it together."

The End

Mummies, ghosts, and graveyards loom in this chapter as a tribute to the one constant in life: death. It is a fact that Burton is happy to acknowledge.

Though some may see his fascination with the grim and ghostly as unhealthy, he believes it is people unable to accept this eventuality who are out of touch with reality—that it is better to explore the possibilities of our demise than to turn it into a taboo, oppressive topic. His prevailing problem with society is the tendency to sweep subjects like death under the rug as a coping mechanism. This is why certain sitcoms, filled with forced cheerfulness, scare Burton more than Hammer horror films.

His exploration of the afterlife is a nod to the constant duality of life and death. Heavily influenced by the celebratory Mexican holiday, Día de los Muertos, his sketches of the dead are often festive.

The possibilities that death offers are endless, and he reminds us that death does not absolve people of their responsibility to live, because no one really knows what happens afterwards. Perhaps death is a party, brighter than life itself, as in Corpse Bride. Perhaps it's a perpetual state of being with long lines and waiting rooms, as in Beetlejuice. Perhaps it's possible to have one's head stolen and used for evil purposes, as in Sleepy Hollow.

He confronts the scary topic of "The End" head on and has fun with it. There is no better way to assuage a natural human fear than to playfully accept its existence. After all, there is comfort in the possibility that after death, you have the potential to become a bioexorcist.

"Tim set up a giant Polaroid camera on one of the stages to shoot large format stills of the puppets. Those photos have such a surreal quality to them—as if the puppets have been caught off guard, not in the context of their roles in the movie, but like candid insights into their own unique, character souls."

"Tim said, that like many of his generation he was brought up watching my movies – which is terribly important to me. 'Sleepy Hollow' was his tribute to the Hammer horror movies he remembers so vividly. It was a very dark film in every sense. Tim got it absolutely right. The most important thing in the making of any film, but particularly in a horror film is to keep the audience in suspense. Don't show anything until it's meant to be a shock. Although there were scenes of violence in 'Sleepy Hollow,' they were very quick and very short but they made their impact. It reflected the art of Hammer horror films in a much more sophisticated and contemporary way."

"Tim doesn't talk much, but his vision is always clear, and usually very funny. Tim's the ideal director for a designer—his distinct and personal vision is supported by a deep knowledge of filmmaking to the most sophisticated degree, so he doesn't let you mess up and he always make you look good, purely as a by-product of getting exactly what he needs on the screen to support the story in his head.

At the same time, one can always bring ideas to Tim, and provided one learns to interpret the subtle difference between a small shake of Tim's head accompanied by a slight sigh (back to the drawing board, what the hell was I thinking), and a nod of the head and a small, affirmative sound (yes!), your path is clear."

John August is one of the most sought-after screenwriters in Hollywood today. His debut film was 1999's critically acclaimed Go, which he also co-produced and served as second unit director. His writing credits include Titan A.E. and Charlie's Angels, as well as writing and directing his first feature film, The Nines. August's initial screenplay for Tim Burton was an adaptation of the novel, Big Fish, for which he received a BAFTA nomination. He then followed with screenplays for Charlie and the Chocolate Factory and Corpse Bride. He recently completed the screenplay for a full-length version of Frankenweenie.

Rick Baker is a six-time Academy Award-winning special effects makeup artist. His work on An American Werewolf in London, Harry and the Hendersons, Men in Black, and the zombies in Michael Jackson's Thriller music video are among the most memorable makeup to grace the screen. Baker attended Cal Arts at the same time as Tim Burton. Their relationship continued beyond school, when Burton hired him to design and create the makeup for Martin Landau's transformation into Béla Lugosi in Ed Wood. This earned Rick his fourth Oscar®. He also created the spectacular primate makeup effects for Planet of the Apes (2001), in the role of Makeup Artist and Special Makeup Effects Designer and Creator.

Helena Bonham Carter is one of the most extraordinary contemporary actresses. Her performances in The Wings of the Dove, Fight Club, and, more recently, as Bellatrix Lestrange in the Harry Potter series, stand as a testament to her diversity and skill. Bonham Carter first met Tim Burton during her role as Ari in the 2001 Planet of the Apes. They began seeing each other shortly thereafter. They now live together with their two children. Bonham Carter has played the roles of Jenny and the Witch in Big Fish, Mrs. Bucket in Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, the voice of Corpse Bride in Corpse Bride, Mrs. Lovett in Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street, and The Red Queen in Alice in Wonderland.

After his passing, she established the Roald Dahl Foundation which offers practical assistance to children and families in two areas: neurology and hematology. Her first meeting with Burton occurred after she agreed to allow a film to be made of James and the Giant Peach, which Burton produced. She later consented for Burton to direct an adaptation of Roald Dahl's Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, for which she was credited as an Executive Producer.

Johnny Depp is one of the most versatile actors of all time. He has consistently taken on unpredictable roles, including Raoul Duke in Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas, Jack Sparrow in Pirates of the Caribbean, and Sir James Matthew Barrie in Finding Neverland. Despite already having appeared in films and television programs, it was his role as Edward Scissorhands that put Depp on the map as a force to be recognized. Burton and Depp since have formed one of the most successful director/actor pairings, as well as lasting friendships, in cinema. Burton cast Depp as the notorious B-Movie director in Ed Wood, Ichabod Crane in Sleepy Hollow, Willy Wonka in Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, the voice of Victor in Corpse Bride, and the murderous barber in Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street. Next up, Depp will play the role of the Mad Hatter in Alice in Wonderland.

Danny DeVito is a renowned director, producer, and actor who first gained prominence for his portrayal of "Louie De Palma" on the popular television series Taxi. Throughout the 1980s and 1990s, DeVito maintained his status as a versatile character actor with memorable roles in movies like Romancing the Stone, Throw Momma from the Train, and Twins. He's also had a great deal of success behind the camera, directing movies like The War of the Roses and Hoffa, in which Burton appears briefly as a corpse in an open casket. DeVito currently stars in the television sitcom It's Always Sunny in Philadelphia. He has worked with Tim Burton on a number of occasions, starting with his role as the Penguin in Batman Returns. He was also the Rude Gambler in Mars Attacks! and the ringmaster, Amos Calloway, in Big Fish.

Danny Elfman is one of the most prolific film composers in modern cinema. Aside from writing the scores and songs to most of Burton's films, Elfman is well known for composing "The Simpsons Theme" as well as being the singer/songwriter of the rock band Oingo Boingo from 1976 until 1995. Burton, who was a fan of Oingo Boingo, asked Elfman to compose the music for P.E.E.-WEE'S BIG ADVENTURE. The score was Elfman's first fully orchestrated work for a film. He went on to score Beetlejuice, Batman, Edward Scissorhands, Batman Returns, The Nightmare Before Christmas, Mars Attacks!, Sleepy Hollow, Planet of the Apes, Big Fish, Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, and Corpse Bride. Elfman also provides the singing voices of Jack Skellington in The Nightmare Before Christmas, the Oompas in Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, and Boneangles in Corpse Bride. Next up, Elfman will be recording the score for Burton's latest film, Alice in Wonderland.

Derek Frey began his career in the film industry at Tim Burton Productions as an assistant to Burton on Mars Attacks!, Sleepy Hollow, Planet of the Apes and Big Fish. Most recently he served as Associate Producer on Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, Corpse Bride and Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street. He is currently working as Associate Producer on Alice in Wonderland. She followed this publication with Arrow Rock: Where the Past is the Future, a documentary book that photographically explores a small, historic town in Missouri. Her latest collaboration with Burton was as Unit Stills photographer on Alice in Wonderland. Her next project will be editing a visual companion for the film.

Carlos Grangel is a highly respected artist and character designer in the world of animation. While still in his teens, he worked on comic strips for Disney and at Steven Spielberg's Amblimation studio in London in 1989, working on We're Back: A Dinosaur's Story and Balto. When Amblimation closed, Grangel came to the newly established DreamWorks SKG as a designer for its animated features, beginning with The Prince of Egypt. Burton felt a strong connection upon seeing Grangel's appealing style of drawing. Grangel served as Character Designer on Corpse Bride, his first project with Burton.

Ray Harryhausen is a world-renowned special effects creator, most notably for his work in stop-motion model animation. His breathtaking animated sequences in films like Jason and the Argonauts, Earth vs. The Flying Saucer, and The Seventh Voyage of Sinbad were a tremendous influence on the young Tim Burton, eventually inspiring him to use stop-motion in his own films. Harryhausen's career spans seven decades and he continues working to this day.

Rick Heinrichs is an Academy Award-winning production designer who began his career at Disney as a sculptor, where he met Burton. Heinrichs believed Burton's ideas could be translated three-dimensionally, and he sculpted the characters in Vincent, which they completed together. He went on to collaborate frequently with Burton, as a producer on Hansel and Gretel; an Associate Producer on Frankenweenie; an Animated Effects Supervisor on PEE-WEE'S BIG ADVENTURE; a Models and Effects Artist on the Faerie Tale Theatre episode that Burton directed, Aladdin and His Wonderful Lamp; a Visual Effects Consultant on Beetlejuice; a Set Designer on Edward Scissorhands; an Art Director on Batman Returns; a Visual Consultant on The Nightmare Before Christmas; and a Production Designer on Sleepy Hollow and Planet of the Apes, the former for which he won an Oscar® and a BAFTA.

She followed this publication with Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street, a companion book to the film. Her next project is designing a visual companion for the film Alice in Wonderland.

Martin Landau made his first major film appearance in Alfred Hitchcock's North by Northwest in 1959. He is perhaps best known for his roles in the television series Mission: Impossible and Space: 1999. Landau won a Best Supporting Actor Oscar® for his first collaboration with Burton, as Béla Lugosi in Ed Wood. He also appears in Burton's Sleepy Hollow, and voiced the character 2 in the animated 9, which Burton produced.

Christopher Lee has appeared in more than 255 films and television productions, possibly the most screen credits by any actor of his generation. His career spans six decades, having gained a new generation of fans following his performances as Saruman the White in The Lord of the Rings: The Fellowship of the Ring and Count Dooku in Star Wars: Episode II - Attack of the Clones. Lee began acting in films in 1948, but it was his role as Dracula in multiple Hammer Horror films of the 1950s, '60s and '70s that captivated Burton's attention. Burton thrived on these films, and, years later, would ask Lee to appear in Sleepy Hollow, their first collaboration. Lee reappeared as Dr. Wonka in Charlie and the Chocolate Factory and was the voice of Pastor Galswells in Corpse Bride. Next up, Lee will lend his distinct vocal talent to the Jabberwocky in the upcoming Alice in Wonderland.

Lindsay MacGowan & Shane Mahan have worked at the forefront of the creature effects field for over two decades and served as Special Makeup and Animatronic Effects Supervisors for Stan Winston Studios (SWS). They have helped breathe life into some of the most memorable cinematic creations in films, such as The Terminator, Aliens, Predator, Jurassic Park, and Iron Man. In 2009, Mahan, MacGowan, and their partners formed Legacy Effects, in honor of Stan Winston's legacy and lifelong achievements.

MacGowan has worked twice with Tim Burton, consisting of his roles in the mold department of SWS, as Effects Supervisor for SWS on Big Fish, and, in his most recent collaboration, as Prosthetic Make up Effects Supervisor on Alice in Wonderland.

Mahan also has been involved on several of Tim Burton's projects. His positions consist of Art Department Coordinator for SWS on Edward Scissorhands, Make-up Designer for the Penguin in Batman Returns, Special Makeup Effects on Mars Attacks!, Key Artist and Puppeteer for SWS on Big Fish, and, most recently, Prosthetic Make-up Effects Supervisor on Alice in Wonderland.

Ian MacKinnon, a puppet maker by trade, learned how to create highly sophisticated stop-motion puppets, and subsequently formed a company with Peter Saunders in 1992, MacKinnon and Saunders. Burton commissioned them to create the Martian character models for Mars Attacks! MacKinnon and Saunders reaffirmed their relationship with Burton on Corpse Bride. Their detailed craftsmanship will next appear in Burton's upcoming stop-motion feature, Frankenweenie.

Alex McDowell is a classically trained painter who opened the graphics design firm, Rocking Russian Design, in 1978, designing album covers and music videos. By the early 1990s, he segued into film as Production Designer on The Crow, Fight Club, and Watchman. McDowell first worked with Burton as Production Designer on Corpse Bride, which led to his BAFTA-nominated work on Charlie and the Chocolate Factory.

Victoria Price, daughter of legendary actor Vincent Price, is a designer, art historian, author, public speaker, and screenwriter. Her father was one of Burton's greatest role models. Burton's first film, Vincent, was about a boy who wanted to be like Vincent Price. Price narrated the film for Burton. Later, Price appeared as an inventor in Edward Scissorhands. Burton also interviewed Price for Conversations with Vincent, some of the last footage of Price before his passing in 1993. It was intended to be a documentary interspersed with Price's film works, but due to legal complications, has yet to be completed. Ms. Price wrote a critically acclaimed biography, Vincent Price: A Daughter's Biography, published in 1999.

Ken Ralston is a master of visual effects technology, with five Oscar® wins for his efforts. His career took off after his work on miniatures and optical effects in Star Wars: Episode IV - A New Hope. As a Visual Effects Supervisor, Ralston has helped create visually stunning films such as Back to the Future, Who Framed Roger Rabbit, Forrest Gump, and Beowulf. He currently serves as the creative head of Sony Pictures Imageworks in the role of Senior Visual Effects Supervisor. Ralston is teaming up with Burton for the first time in the visual effects spectacular, Alice in Wonderland.

Paul Reubens is an actor, writer, and comedian, best known for his character Pee-wee Herman. Reubens joined the Los Angeles troupe, The Groundlings, in the 1970s and started his career as an improvisational comedian and stage actor. In 1982, he staged a live production of The Pee-wee Herman Show. It ran for five sellout months; HBO taped the performance and aired it as a special. Its success prompted Warner Bros. to hire Reubens to write a script for a full-length Pee-wee Herman film. When Reubens and the producers of PEE-WEE'S BIG ADVENTURE saw Burton's work on Vincent and Frankenweenie, they decided the neophyte would be an excellent director for their film. Reubens and Burton worked together again on Batman Returns, where Reubens plays the Penguin's Father. He also provided the voice of Lock in The Nightmare Before Christmas.

Deep Roy is a distinctive actor with numerous eclectic roles in his acting history. His unforgettable screen roles include the Italian Assassin in The Pink Panther Strikes Again, Teeny Weeny in The Neverending Story, Princess Aura's Pet, Fellini, in Flash Gordon, and the menacing Van Bullock in Roots of Evil (Burton's personal favorite). Roy has worked with Burton on a number of films, including three primate parts in Planet of the Apes - a Gorilla Kid, Thade's Niece, and an Ape Tourist, as well as a human role in the climatic battle sequence. Burton also cast Roy as Mr. Soggybottom in Big Fish, 165 Oompa Loompas in Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, and the voice of General Bonesapart in Corpse Bride.

Winona Ryder is a gifted and nuanced actress with an array of film credits, including Heathers, The Age of Innocence, Dracula, Little Women, and Star Trek. She first worked with Burton as the young goth outsider, Lydia Deetz, in Beetlejuice. Her performance gained her critical and commercial recognition. The two paired up again in Edward Scissorhands, where Ryder played Kim Boggs, delivering a naturalistic portrait of a young woman at first repulsed, then later drawn to the freakish but gentle Edward Scissorhands.

Richard Zanuck is an Academy Award-winning producer and son of Darryl F. Zanuck, the famed head of Twentieth-Century Fox studios. Richard Zanuck was president of Fox Studios before joining up with David Brown to form Zanuck/Brown Productions. The pair went on to produce Steven Spielberg's first two feature films: The Sugarland Express and Jaws. Zanuck also is credited as producer on The Verdict, Cocoon, and Driving Miss Daisy. His first project with Burton was as producer on the reimagining of Planet of the Apes (the first version was made under Zanuck's time as president at Fox Studios). Since then, he has produced four more of Burton's films, including Big Fish, Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street, and Alice in Wonderland.

With a book this massive, it's amazing we're all still alive at the end of it, and I would like to thank my life support. Namely, my family, because they're amazing, and have always given me unwavering encouragement - Mom, Dad, Andrea, Rianna and Mikey - love you all so much. I wanted to give a shout out to all of my friends for always being there even if I'm not, particularly the Loop, Aiko, Glen, Nora, Molly, & my cuz Joy. I also wanted to thank the town of Arrow Rock, (especially Chet, Bunny, Ken, Jr, Missy & the gang), because my work there gave me the skills for this book, and because I love them like a second family. But most of all, Derek, for being there day in and day out, a constant source of strength; for his patience during countless rounds of text-editing; and for being the only reason I'm still sane.

Holly

Many late nights of loud music (sorry neighbors) and caffeine induced design zones make you truly appreciate your support group. I know everybody says it, but I really do have the best family in the world! Mom, Pop (aka 'The Kid'), Ivy and Heather (the most supportive sisters a girl could ask for), my bro- Carlos, my nephews-TJ & Zachary... you are all beyond wonderful and I love you guys so much. Also, thanks Aiko for keeping my back and neck happy with your patented massages. And Davina Divine and Ross, thanks for chumming me when I needed a wee break! - I love you.
